FROM THE PRESIDENT'S NEST:

Question: What does NWR stand for?

If a proposed 'light goose' hunt happens as planned next year at Squaw Creek, NWR could stand for "Nail 'em With a Rifle." For the past three-quarters of a decade, its been well known among wildlife biologists, naturalists, and birders that the unbridled Lesser Snow Goose population is wreaking havoc on the tundra ecosystem where they breed. An abundance of southerly winter forage and flocking locales created by human activity, together with less hunting pressure and predation has led to a sizeable population increase.

But in nature out-of-balance, one species' road to success is often at the expense of others. The goose's population increase has had a negative impact on species with which they share the fragile tundra. Over time, the Snow Goose's success will become its undoing, not to mention that of other species. In an effort to hasten the rebalancing of nature, Congress has passed legislation which aims (pun intended) to reduce Snow Goose numbers.

From a wildlife management standpoint, the intent is all well and good, but other locales exist where hunting can, and should, take place besides the protective confines of a wildlife refuge. After all, what is the purpose of a refuge but a place where native wildlife can feed, rest, and seek haven from hunting pressures? Waterfowl hunting of any one species on refuge property will be disruptive to others, as well.

I urge you to contact Squaw Creek NWR manager, Mr. Ron Bell (Ron_Bell@fws.gov), and ask that the management team reconsider the proposed hunt. For more information on the light goose hunting plan, visit: http://www.fws.gov/midwest/SquawCreek/
